PS 2964
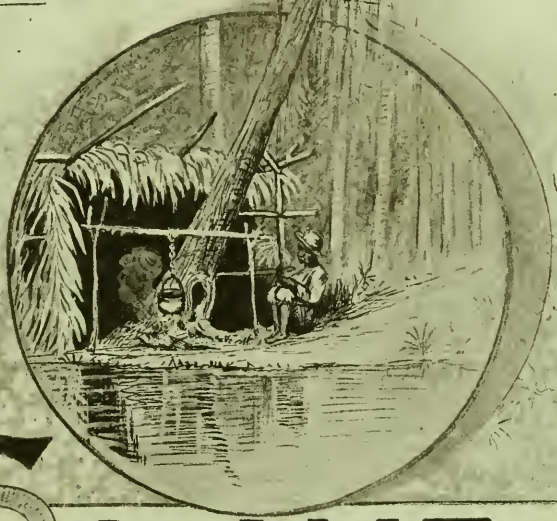
.S2

WAUKEENAH'S



SLAVE.

WAUKEENAH'S SLAVE.

A LEGEND

By

T. O. SUMMERS.

WITH 18 ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

DRAWN BY,

HORACE W. WIGHTMAN.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS
COPYRIGHT
NOV 21 1890
27672 V

CARLTON REGAND.
PUBLISHER.
1160. BROADWAY.
New York.

PS 2964
.S2

COPYRIGHT 1891, BY
CARLTON REGAND.
All rights reserved

WAUKEENAH'S

SLAVE.

List of Illustrations.

Camp fire. . . . . Cover.
City Gates. Spanish Helmet 1
WAUKEENAH. 3
WATCH Tower. 5
Oldest house in St Augustine. 7 Florida cracker and ox cart 9
Part of wall in old fort 11 Sea wall. Dungeon in fort. 13 Scene in the Everglades. 15 Indian and slave. Government wall. . . . 19 St Johns River opposite Welaka 21 St Augustine yacht Club. 23
Old Slave market. 25 Lenoir. 29
Dungeon in Fort SAN MARCO. 33
On the Miami River. 37
Entrance to Ponce de Leon. 41 Ponce de Leon, and Alcazar. . . . . Cover.

LEGEND.

It is said that a short time ago an Indian Chief appeared on the Streets of St Augustine accompanied by an old negro man.

After viewing the wonderful Ponce de Leon Hotel, and the ancient Fort, he tried to sell the slave; but upon being informed that slavery was a thing of the past, he offered the negro his freedom, and returned alone to his home in the Everglades.

WATCH TOWER SANMARCO 1656.

On the blue Matanzas frowning,
With its proud Castillian crest All its dark embrasures crowning Looks San Marco
from the west.

There it stands, a strange exotic,
In this land of palms and sands;
Planted by a race despotic, Reared by shackled Indian hands.

Once the sheen of Moorish lances Glittered from those gray old walls; Spaniards wove their weird romances In those dark coquina halls.

At its' feet all cramped and crouching, Lies the ancient sea girt town;
Eltrich houses.
gables touching.
Roofs of tilings rude and brown

Through those gates now old and crumbling, Proudly pranced the Knights of Spain, Now the ox team slowly rumbling, Enters from the sandy plain.

Garden wall and quaint piazza Mauritanian portals low.
Old Cathedral, Market plaza,
Tell the tale of long ago.
Spain has lost her tyrant power,
And her flag no more is seen Flying from that grim old tower, Once the pride of Augustine.

O'er it floats Columbia's banner, Emblem of the free and brave; Guarded by no mailed retainer, Minion, vassal, serf or slave.

Far within this land of flowers,
In the gloom of forest shades Indian braves dwell
'neath the bowers
Of the pathless Everglades.

There was one,
a tawny giant,
Last of all his scattered tribe, Remnant of a race defiant, Néer subdued, nor won with bribe.

By the still Miami River Roamed Waukeenah child of doom, And his steps had wandered never
From his fathers forest home.

All his Kindred brave had perished
All had been the whitemans foe
And within his heart he cherished Hate that burned with hellish glow.

Once as silently he pondered O'er the fate that doomed his race,
And with wild conjecture wondered Who would come to fill his place;

Suddenly a great emotion Swept across his heaving breast,
As a storm breaks on the ocean,
When its waves are all at rest.

Near a spring whose crystal flashes Ripple to the tideless wave
By the campfires smouldering ashes, Sat a captive Indian slave Years had flown since from the battle
He had been as booty brought In the days when like dumb cattle Afric's sons were sold and bought.

Kindred ties had long been broken,
And his rude uncultured tongue,
Only Indian words had spoken, Only Indian songs had sung.

As he sat, Waukeenah turning Thus, with frowning visage spoke "Rise Lenoir my heart is burning To behold this pale faced folk.

I have heard the wondrous story Of their crowded cities great
Of their deeds on fields of glory Where my fathers met their fate.

Foes they are To both our races Mine has perished by their hands
I would look into their faces
I would view their fertile lands."

By Welaka's still meandering, On through hammock marsh and plain,
After long and weary wandering.
They behold the mighty main

* Former name of St. John's River, meaning chain of lakes.

Saw they then the harbor teeming With the sails of moving ships, Heard the throbbing engines screaming,
And great wonder sealed their lips.

From the old cathedral pealing, Rang the chimes out on the air;
O'er Waukeenah came a feeling Of a strange and deep despair.

Round them both there soon assembled,
Those who would their mission Know,
And Waukeenah's great form trembled,
As he spoke in accents slow;

"I have come to view this city To behold your works of art;
But I ask not love or pity From the white man's murderous heart.

Once my fathers brave, defended With their lives this lovely land;
With its' soil their blood is blended, Dying by your conquering hand.

I am now content to perish;
Since your glory
I have seen,
Naught there is for me to cherish,
But the thought of what has been.

By the banks of that lone river,
In my far off forest home,
I shall dwell, unknown forever,
And await my peoples doom.

Take this slave, twas here I found him,
Take him at the price ye name, With your shackles ye have bound him
To a life of toil and Shame.

Scarcely had the words
been uttered,
When a negro bowed with years, Trembling towards Waukeenah
tottered,
And his eyes were filled with tears.

With a voice all filled with feeling, To Waukeenah thus he spoke.
And his frame
all bent and reeling, With a strange emotion shook:

Savage see my head is hoary,
And I soon shall be at rest;
But my heart leaps at your story,
And a wild hope fills my breast.

Streaming from yon ancient tower,
See that starry banner wave, Neath its folds, no man hath power God's own image to enslave.

I have felt the curse of slavry, Under which my people groaned, Yours have perished in their bravry, Dying for the land they owned.

But a brighter day has broken,
And its bars of massy Light
Are the bright and peaceful token,
Of the triumph of the right.

Open then thy long closed vision,
And the present glory see Thou canst find a noble mission
'Neath the banner of the free.

"No" Waukeenah answered sadly,
Not for me the white man's art;
See these pulses beat too madly,
I have still a savage heart

Ye may take this poor old creature, Tell him of his changed estate,
It may please his servile nature,
I shall choose my fathers fate".

Then Waukeenah proudly turning
From the plaza moved away,
With a heart all filled with yearning
For his wild home, far away.

As he stood there dumb with wonder Looked the old man on Lenoir,
And he cried in voice of thunder
"I HAVE SEEN THAT FACE BEFORE."

Then there came an inspiration
Of a strange and wondrous light, Dawning like a new creation,
On the dark of nature's night.

"It is he! in every feature,
I can well his Kinship trace; Naught deceives the eye of nature.
Son, behold thy father's face!

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

In the west, the sun was setting; Ponce de Leon's windows flamed;
And a weird fantastic fretting,
With a purpling splendor streamed.

Through its gorgeous halls and spaces, Moved the masters of the earth,
But not one of all their faces Told what real joy was worth.

A ray of heavenly light was beaming
From two faces on that eve;
Through their hearts such peace was streaming, As the world can never give.

3609

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS
0 016 256 101 7